

These days, it seems like just about everyone is offended by something. Smoking, red meat, religion (or lack thereof)—everyone has an issue that pushes their buttons. Whether it's the nuisance of secondhand smoke or the onset of global warming, divisive topics jam airwaves and internet pages, as Americans vent their frustrations with the other side's opinions. But instead of squabbling over the views of others, Judge Lawrence Grey has an idea.

"Hey, lighten up. Have a jelly donut."

With this delightful book Judge Grey makes it his goal to unify America by offending as many people as possible. Sparing no one, Judge Grey offers up his unfiltered views on issues of politics, religion, sex, and health. Satirizing one and all, he takes America back to the days when we tolerated objectionable ideas and argued against them, but without trying to suppress them.

"Nowadays, being offended has become part of our political debate. We have become a nation where everyone is either a victim or a suspect and where, above all else, humor is not permitted"

—Judge Lawrence Grey

(Continued on back flap)